7. BACKGROUND

Corymbia citriodora (Lemon Scented Gum) is a species which grows to 35 metres in height, from north-eastern Australia. Despite its limited natural distribution, the attractive form and scented foliage of the species has made it popular for use in large parks and gardens throughout Australia.

Native trees gained popularity during the 1940's to 1950's as gardeners began to embrace a new Australian garden style being promoted by local designers including Betty Maloney and Edna Walling. The new approach became part of a wider focus on environmental issues during the 1960's to 1970's. Since this time, numerous Eucalyptus and Corymbia species have combined with other Australian natives, to create a new aesthetic layer in Hunters Hill.

The Lemon Scented Gum is located in the front garden area of 14 Gaza Avenue. The subject lot was built upon during the 1950s and the original dwelling remains. The current size of the Lemon Scented Gum suggests a planting date from the 1970s.

The Lemon Scented Gum is regarded as significant in terms of its size and prominent location. The Lemon Scented Gum makes an important visual contribution to the urban landscape, particularly in an area with few large trees.
